Piazza Garibaldi	Piazza Garibaldi, full of large trees, had a complex and articulated formation: its sides were in fact completed at different times, as a function of the large "Riva" school building which became a very significant presence. Even if its current appearance is the result of interventions that took place until the 1960s, Piazza Garibaldi presents its own unity in the layout of the streets that branch off from it and in the presence of buildings dating back mostly to the first half of the twentieth century. Among these, Palazzo Zedda stands out, which is on the corner of Via Macomer, a fine example of rationalist architecture, characterized by its façade with two-tone bands. The square today constitutes one of the focal points of city traffic, channeled by the central flowerbeds, rearranged several times precisely to streamline it. Named after the last of the fallen of the First World War, the very young officer Alberto Riva Villasanta, the elementary school building occupies a vast front on Piazza Garibaldi, extending symmetrically into two wings that enclose a courtyard close to the convent of San Domenico.		15:00-15:30	View on Google Maps
